

Question: Why must we suppress certain assembly constraints when creating the dynamic simulation?

This is largely because there are some assembly constraints that are not suppressed during the dynamic simulations. As a result, certain parts can move in places we don't want such as the possibility of the fan moving up or down to a place where we don't want it intersecting such as the body.